Internationalism and the Arts at the Fin de Siècle is a multidisciplinary series that explores cosmopolitan practices and processes of cultural exchange across national boundaries at a crucial historical moment. The period from the late nineteenth century to the early twentieth century was characterized by national consolidation, empire-building and catastrophic conflict. As part of the same process of collective encounter and self-definition, this time was also marked by international cooperation, proposals for world government, and transnational communities that challenged the nation state. The arts were central to the formation of national identities, and cultural practitioners (artists, writers, musicians, dramatists) were expected to shore up national traditions. Yet their lives were often cosmopolitan and their practices shaped by cross-cultural collaboration.

The series provides a forum for scholars working in the emerging area of cultural internationalism. It challenges the emphasis on national schools as the foundation of scholarly analysis, and it draws attention to the vigour of internationalist art and ideology in an age which is more usually remembered for jingoism and war. Proposals for monographs, edited collections and anthologies of primary sources will be considered.

Edited by Dr Grace Brockington, University of Bristol

Advisory Board
Stephen Banfield, Professor of Music, University of Bristol
Christopher Green, Professor Emeritus of the History of Art, Courtauld Institute
Marina Frolova-Walker, Reader in Music History, University of Cambridge
Elizabeth Prettejohn, Professor of the History of Art, University of Bristol
Tore Rem, Professor of English Literature, University of Oslo
Sarah Street, Professor of Film and Foundation Chair of Drama, University of Bristol

Peter Lang Ltd
www.peterlang.com

For more information please contact either the series editor at the Department of History of Art, University of Bristol, 9 Woodland Rd, Bristol, BS8 1TB, United Kingdom, e-mail: G.Brockington@bristol.ac.uk, or the publisher at oxford@peterlang.com.